Ripe Tomato Sweet Pickle.

Pour boiling water over ripe tomatoes and remove skin, place them in jars, cover with apple vinegar and let them remain three days. Take out of vinegar and put in a preserving kettle, add three quarters of a pound of sugar to each pound of tomatoes; add teaspoonful each of cinnamon, cloves, allspice and mace not ground; let boil several hours until tomatoes are clear, then seal.

Blow to Georgia Marine.

Atlanta, Ga., July 24.—What might have been a long step toward creating a merchant marine of Georgia's own was lost in the house Friday because there were so many absentees that the necessary two-thirds majority for a constitutional amendment could not be mustered. This was the Shuptrine bill, exempting from the taxation all Georgia owned and operated ships engaged in foreign commerce exclusively.

GEN. PORFIRIO DIAZ POPULAR IN SPAIN

Spanish Press Full of Admiration and Praise for Late Mexican Dictator.

Madrid, July 22.—The sympathy and warm regard of the Spanish people for the late General Porfirio Diaz, it seems, could have scarcely been greater had he been a Spaniard. The newspapers of the capital are filled with laudatory appreciations of the things the former resident of Mexico accomplished for his native land and refer to "the close ties of friendship and mutual understanding which always bound him to the mother country."

The morning after his death El Imparcial, which is almost official in character, published a telegram briefly announcing the demise of the great Mexican. Under the telegram was printed an editorial note: "At the moment of closing the forms of this edition, we received the above telegram. We have not time to render due to homage to the good friend of Spain who has just died, but we shall do so tomorrow. It was a debt of gratitude for our country to celebrate the praises of this man who loved it so sincerely."

True to its promise, El Imparcial printed the next day a long article by Mariano de Cavia under the heading "A Sketch of Porfirio Diaz", which is full of admiration of the dead soldier and statesman. The old anecdote of Bismarck is recalled—that the iron chancellor said of Mexico's man of iron: "He is a man who should have been a German, and my successor." To this story de Cavia adds another, less familiar, to illustrate the pride of don Porfirio in what blood of his was Spanish and in the common tongue of the new and old Spain.

According to the story of the shopkeepers of the city of Mexico won't to entice the trade of the many foreigners in Mexico by printing their signs in French, German, or more often "Gringo"—English. On one of his daily walks, the fact struck the "dictator" as incongruous that the shopkeepers of Mexico should print their signs in anything but the tongue of Hernan Cortes—and his own. On his return to "Cadena 8," as his private residence was known to every shirtless peon of the land, he sent for whomever happened to bear the designation for the moment of "competent authority."

"My dear governor," the president is quoted as saying, "in a week's time. I want all the signs in this city in our national language." The governor objected that foreigners and companies had the right to have their signs and their advertisements in other tongues than Spanish, and that, respecting the Mexicans themselves, there might be constitutional difficulties in the way of the president's order.

"What you mean is that such an order smacks a little too much of tyranny," mused the "dictator." "Very well. If a Mexican citizen wants to use a foreign language in his advertising, I cannot constitutionally prevent it. But you, as the head of the municipality, can levy a tax on the luxury of using a foreign language—a tax of four pesos per sign, say. You know my wishes, my dear governor; the matter is in your hands. Are we living in Mexico, or in Babel?"

"For more than thirty years," writes de Cavia, "he gave Mexico peace, and with peace a wonderful development of the fertile riches of the country and a solid respectability before the world. What an unhappy change since his departure. The anarchy in which Mexico is plunged today in conclusive proof—doctrinaire opinions and subjective criticism laid aside—that don Porfirio knew his complex and mixed-blooded people better than anyone else—that he knew their overweening propensity towards internal revolution well enough to apply to them this homely phrase, a favorite of his when speaking of his compatriots: "When the bars of the corral are let down, the colts go astray."

How to Make "Eyes" in Cheese.

In the live stock and dairy department of the current issue of Farm and Fireside a contributor gives the following entertaining account of the process by which "eyes" are put in cheese:

"Putting 'eyes' into 'blind' Swiss cheese is one of the late achievements of the dairy-products experts of the United States department of agriculture. Hitherto the bane of the American maker of Swiss cheese has been the occasional blind cheese—the cheese lacking the big holes, or eyes that characterize the genuine Emmentaler cheese from Switzerland. Eyes have been a sort of hit-and-miss proposition with the American manufacturer. Now the government experts of the dairy division of the department are in a position to insure eyes, without, however, being able to go so far as to control their number or size.

Briefly, the process is to macerate a small piece of good Swiss cheese and incubate it in when at room temperature for twenty-four hours, after which the culture is added to the milk before it is set with rennet. This system will give practical insurance against blind cheese, but it won't insure eyes of the precise Emmentaler type. Sometimes there are too many; sometimes they are too big. The elimination of blind cheese, however, is a long step ahead in the manufacture of domestic Swiss.

The department experts are experimenting now with a view to finding out how to control eyes as to number and size."
